TYPICAL STREET CROSS SECTION (MINIMUM)

2. TYPICAL ARRANGEMENT OF UTILITIES AND IMPROVEMENTS IN RESIDENTIAL STREET

3. TYPICAL DRIVEWAY ENTRANCES

4. TYPICAL SUBDIVISIONS AND OTHER DIVISIONS

A. Not a subdivision

The 10 acres existing parcel is divided into two parcels, but the remaining parcel is larger than 5 acres after the division.

B. Subdivision

The remaining parcel is less than 5 acres, so both parcels or lots comprise the subdivision.

C. Subdivision

The proposed 1 acre lot and the new street comprise a subdivision, because in this case a new street is involved for access. The remaining parcel of 9 acres need not be included in the subdivision if ownership is not intended to be transferred.

D. Not a subdivision

Proposed lots are not contiguous, because they are separated by the remaining parcel of more than 5 acres.

E. Subdivision

The remaining parcel is reduced to less than 5 acres, so subdivision ends up with three contiguous lots.

F. Subdivision

The two proposed 1 acre lots constitute a subdivision because they are contiguous.

G. Not a subdivision

The two lots either proposed or remaining have 5 acres, therefore this does not constitute a subdivision.

H. Not a subdivision

One of the two lots either proposed or remaining has 5 acres.

I. Subdivision

The two lots having 4 acres and 3 acres would comprise a subdivision.

J. Subdivision

Existing parcel ends up with two parcels or lots each with less than 5 acres and they will be contiguous.

K. Subdivision

Existing parcel of 5 acres ends up being 4 acres, therefore the two lots comprise the subdivision.

L. Not a subdivision

The existing parcel of 6 acres ends up being 5 acres.

M. Subdivision

Division of existing parcel includes a new street for access. All of the lots would comprise the subdivision, except that the remaining parcel of 5 acres could be excluded if ownership is not intended for transfer.
